Hey everyone. I took time away over the last several months to focus on my personal life and wellness because it needed my attention. I want to start by thanking those who have shown me kindness and love over the last several months. Your compassion has helped me in ways I can't even begin to describe. I do not take it lightly. Thank you so much.

That all being said, today, I want to talk to the community regarding concerns that have spread mostly on Twitter as well as my experiences with Saberspark. People who support me deserve answers and my absence has unfortunately only reinforced narratives about this idea that I wish to cause problems while attempting to avoid accountability by running away. I didn't log off to run away. I logged off to prioritize my physical health because it had been neglected for too long because of issues with eating. I drowned it out with social media and the events of summer 2025 made it so I could not do that any longer and I chose my health.

I want to start by talking about what happened last year involving my personal experience and the way my story about Saberspark became public. I shared my personal experiences with people privately to vent my frustrations. When sharing these details with people privately, I had no intention of truly ever coming fully forward. My story was shared anonymously. And when people began theorizing that the story belonged to me, those involved in making content about the allegations gave me an ultimatum between allowing large channels to speculate it being my story while sharing a bunch of misinformation found from websites like Kiwi Farms or to come forward and give myself the chance to share why these rumors on Kiwi Farms were not true. During this ultimatum from people who said they believed me, I was told if I really loved my family, I would lay low and I was terrified.

Because I was scared and didn't want anything to get worse, especially through huge platforms spreading harmful misinformation, I came forward, though I really did not want to. Eventually, it spiraled more out of control and I was being pulled in multiple directions and I kept trying to please everyone who got involved who said they wanted to help. I decided to release a video on my own channel where I took control of my story and narrative again because at that point, it was too late and I needed to provide context to my personal experiences once more content came out about my experience. Thank you to those who watched it all of the way through.

While I stand by the fact that what I went through is real and made an impact on me, I also understand that the way everything played out publicly was messy, painful, and not helpful for anyone involved.

If I had the chance to do things differently this year, I would. Not because I'm invalidating my own experience, but because none of this really needed to be anyone's business but my own. I should have relied on my personal support system instead of talking to others about it who I didn't know well. And because too, I don't want Saberspark to have to answer to what I now feel was misjudgement. He genuinely believes I consented because I have a tendency to try to smooth things over, people please, and avoid the uncomfortability of confronting people over difficult things. That was obvious when I reread our conversations and it embarrasses me to see. That is not his fault. During the events, I was 18, fresh out of high school. We became friends only a month after I graduated when I had been a fan of his since he made his Ballad of the Brony when I was 17. I was extremely inexperienced and it played a role in how I tried handling what happened. Our message conversations are not something I remember well from 13 years ago and had I remembered, it would have reflected in my decision making and overall view of how I was treated after having some time. Truth be told, my hurt and discomfort overrode his intentions and it's really the only thing that I carried with me for so long. Though I don't believe intentions change the impact the two occurrences left on me, trying to see it from his perspective as I read our conversations offers me a sense of closure. While I do think how he's handled this situation has been poor, such as framing a genuine pregnancy scare as some malicious trap or implying I faked an anxiety attack I was already having before he showed up, I want to believe that had I talked about it to him privately, maybe he would have been more open to my perspective and how his actions caused me harm.

Frankly, my story did not need to be shared to anyone apart from my friends and my therapists. I am holding myself accountable and will grow from this but I will not take responsibility over the notion that I wanted clout when I never even wanted my name attached to any of this or the notion that my experiences were fabricated. Giving into these notions for "forgiveness" would only prove to myself that I haven't learned anything. I have been that person for so long and what I have gone through has finally given me the courage to not be that anymore.

I want to be someone with a platform that exercises behaviors that inspire others, not someone who struggles to maintain boundaries through oversharing or not standing up for basic respect. I don't want to be someone who feels the need to bring attention to every single negative thing said about me through responding or finding myself getting involved in situations that shouldn't get my personal time. That being said, now is probably one of the most important times where I do need to respond, though I'm still trying to navigate the best way to do this while staying firm in my need for a private life. My lack of boundaries with not only others but also myself has landed me in a lot of conflict. A lot. Honestly, probably all of them. In quite literally every single conflict I have found myself in, both public and private, I have learned better ways that I could have handled them if I had stood more firm in my boundaries with myself and with others. Not only to improve the outcome for me but likely the outcome for the other person involved. Good boundaries, I am learning especially now, means that you care about your relationships, which I do, but upholding boundaries is something I am working on. To be honest, it was something I didn't realize was such a problem for me until the last two years or so, as more and more conflict continued and I began reflecting and questioning my part in this. This reflection began in 2024 and during this year in particular. This year, I especially yearned for self improvement and knowledge. I have tried handling things privately, addressing issues, all the while frequently biting my tongue both to people when trying to communicate privately and also publicly by not sharing certain things to not hurt people. There is an intention to do right by others and do my best but I have fallen short because of not being able to be uncomfortable confronting others as well as make tough choices. And the times I have stood up for myself in the past, I typically always needed someone to directly help me. It is a learned behavior from trauma but that is only an explanation, not an excuse. I am currently in the process to work hard to fix this and continue trying to be the best version of myself that I can. I want that hard work to reflect in my future actions. As I said before, I care about inspiring and encouraging other people and I want to make sure I am encouraging and inspiring the right things.

As for the several other topics I am aware of that have sparked from this and the ones that have resurfaced from years ago, I will be sharing a video from a dear friend of mine who created an essay going over as many of them as humanely possible. Not everyone jumping in on hot topics shares things in good faith with the intention of holding me accountable but I tried to provide to him as much as I could for things that really could not go ignored. I'm not holding back anymore and am putting everything out on the table so I can move forward. Thankfully, I have been able to provide a lot of evidence of many of my experiences. While I did provide things in this essay to give him a full picture of events, please know that my involvement doesn't go beyond sharing proof and my personal testimonies to Coop directly. This was ultimately Coop's project and he did most of the heavy lifting regarding the information revealed, tackling topics, sharing his personal feelings on these topics and choosing what information he finds relevant to share, most of which are publicly accessible with me helping to provide evidence to the few things that weren't public. In the video, he points out which topics I provided evidence for directly. I would like to ask that anyone who wants answers on certain topics to please take your time to watch the entire video from start to finish. The video is very long but he will be breaking it down into chapters to make it easier to navigate if you only care about a certain topic. There is a lot to go over so Coop wanted to be as thorough as possible. He also provides a Google drive with over a thousand screenshots that I helped him with.

I am going to be staying off of this platform for the foreseeable future because it doesn't help me with my growth and nurtures my unhealthy habits. Places like Instagram have helped me separate the difference between sharing something to the public and sharing something to my personal friends. Despite what people believe here, I don't thrive off being seen as a victim. No one should ever want to gain notoriety from bad experiences. I'm a music and voice over artist, and I want my work to speak for itself. Me struggling with these unhealthy habits have only really gone against my ability to make that clear.

I will be returning to uploading normal content on YouTube in 2026 and I intend to focus on giving people the music and the audio show they signed up for that is still happening. I am not going anywhere and I am going to continue to create things that make me happy while showing my intentions to improve as a human. I will still be taking my time as I continue physically recovering but I can't wait to finally release what I have been working on for the past few years. If you are a Twitter mutual of mine or someone I follow who doesn't have my contact beyond Twitter messages, please email me so we can get reconnected or reach out on Instagram. Thank you for reading.
